"THE CAT AND THE MICE" ✓

By Paul Terry. >

Mrs. Mouse is seen taking her children out for a walk. The cat sees his prey and trails along waiting for a suitable opportunity to pounce upon it. Mrs. Mouse becomes terror-stricken and is forced to pick a round-about way on her journey home. Here Mr. Mouse waits impatiently for the return of his spouse. Finally she arrives and tells of the menacing cat. The cat, meanwhile, has arrived at the barrell, which is the dwelling place of the mouse family. Unable to enter, he waits outside. The frightened mice, however, pick up their belongings and move to more secluded quarters. The acts of the cat finally become too much for them, and Mr. Mouse calls his clan to an indignation meeting and a plot to overthrow the cat is formed. The mice then appear before the cat in a body, and the latter, forgetting to be cautious, starts to pursue them. The mice all run from their enemy into a huge boot, and the cat follows them. Inside the boot the cat is unable to fight back and the mice make quick work of him, illustrating the moral of the story.

The moral -- "Victory comes not always to the strong."
